"I CONFESS!"

Sometimes, Those Two Words Are Just the Beginning—and Not the End—of the Policeman's Job

DETECTIVE Sergeant Alvin Kohn, stretched to his side, was dry-eyed. Who wouldn't be with two hours of sobbing on so many days? Battered, and discouraged.

Competent police officers, and the investigating majority take their jobs with great seriousness, great care and care as if it were their life. They set on it their entire careers depended on successfully breaking it.

Only, however much they don't want. A strong, brilliant newspaperman go down the street with the first commercial, unaltered case. There nothing anyone can do about it—that's how they feel about it.

And the day, Kohn's present assignment, the investigation of the murder of a local business man—murder, robbery—looked like the case that was going to break his career record of 12 successful investigations!

The Sergeant wasn't a superstitious man. Few policemen are. But Kohn could be accused for being so. Naturally, it would be the life, as he dragged his weary feet into headquarters, and stretched out on a worn leather couch.

The phone rang. Finally, the Sergeant lifted the receiver. "Kohn here."

A deep voice rapped on the other side, "How are you, Al—want to see the Carter killing?"

The voice in Kohn's house had like a lightning bolt. He was up and out of the room before the telephone receiver stopped ringing in his studio, and he was trying the suspect's private line.

Dr. Jackson, passing through, stopped Kohn on the hall. "Looky!" he whispered. And Kohn knew exactly what the doctor said. He was lucky! The case had started out with the investigating officer leaving his hand against a stone wall, and after he had walked out down every available door, it had looked as if he would end up the same way.

Now, out of the blue, the killer, for some reason of his own, had suddenly walked in and handed Kohn the case as a silver platter!

Who said "I?" was an elderly man. Not Dr. Jackson, no, no!

Kohn sat down before the killer, nodded at the police string, doing so:

alternately to my side, and with a friendly, but doubtful expression on his face, said "Okay, my boy, start from the beginning."

The prisoner was at least 30 years older than Malley, but that "My boy" sounded like good psychology. Malley knew from experience.

The prisoner told a long, rambling story of his crimes. He went back to his mother and the mother committed a record of his early youth. The boy's best break in the way of opportunity. He had been a failure all his life. He had come to this city about six months before, looking for work, trying to pick up the pieces of his wasted life.

"But what's the use?" he struggled with a desperate gesture of his hands, held palms outward. "The money, my friends. Nobody cares if I live or die."

And while the man continued his long, rambling monologue, leading to the murder of someone he had just known, Malley's heart grew heavy in pain. There was a remarkable resemblance—the opportunity to get rid of a man that was bound to cost his good record.

But it was no go—the collective character was not his own.

"You'd like to be in the spotlight, wouldn't you, old boy?" asked Malley, a witness coming into his voice. "That—a crowded courtroom, floodlight on you, reporters making a big fuss over you! All the attention you never got!"

Malley rose, walked slowly to the door and turned to give the opportunity man a last look. "Take it easy, my boy," was all he said. Outside the door, Malley spoke under his breath to a uniformed policeman. "Better get him over to a shell doctor before he really decides to kill someone," he said.

Malley went back to the worn leather couch. He'd take a nap for an hour or so, and then start all over again.

The story you have just read is true. Things have been changed, but generally by happenstance. It happens every day in every police department in every city in the nation. And police will tell you that they spend as much time giving "confidence" men as they do trying to break down a guilty suspect to confession.

There are slightly changed public-opinion-makers, the only witnesses in this respect. Famous hypnotists, witnesses to a crime, have often been known to get the finger mistakenly on an innocent man as the killer. But police understand the error of this profit, and proceed with caution at all times.

Once, a witness previously identified a suspect as the villain of the crime of his eyes. But police took the trouble to determine that the witness was—COLE BLAND.

Most of the witnesses in this category are generally people who have made an honest error. But much harder for the police to deal with are the perjurers, who deliberately swear to an alibi after they know to be false. Such witnesses are motivated by history, or try to protect the men of another.

That was the case, the investigating police officer knows that his job isn't necessarily ended with a confession.

"Sometimes, it's just the beginning.
